Two Breats Burders Near the Capital of the American Tyrol.

VENNA, Sept. 25.—A terrible double traffely of the "Jack the Ripper?" class is reported from Amras, net far from Innaprinsk, capital of the American Tyrol. On Friday last a young and pretry waitrons of Amras, went away from her supplayer's residence in order to witness a religions procession near that place. On her roturn home the girl was mardered and the only clew found up to the present of her assissin is a razor-edged knife, which was picked up near her body. The number caused a great sensation in the neighborhood. Close to the spot where the waitrons was found yesterday. In addition, another woman belonging to the same neighborhood is missing. Finding rioficals and fuel in the kitchen, I cooked myself a meal and made a suffi-ciently good breakfass. Then I lighted my pipe and took my seat at the front door to watch for the coming of Felix ald. Whether my suspicious would be discelled or confirmed by his lemeanor I was of course unable to say until the interview took place. But I vas most auxious to know.

All that morning I looked down the winding road to Marshminster, but saw no one coming therefrom. Not a soul was in sight, and if I did for a moment think that Strent and his daughter might roturn and declare themselves in coent the thought was banished by a speeches in such cities and towns as few hours' outlook. > I re-entered the house, locked ap everything, and stranning on my knansack took my departure toward Marsh-minster. Some way down the road I looked back at the ruin and saw it loom more grim and ghastly than ever. Even in the bright sunshine it could not appear otherwise than eerie, and it was with great pleasure that I left it be-hind. Yet under those sloping roofs Francis Briggfield lay dead, and it was to discover his assassin and aver death that I set my face toward Marshminster.

> > CHAPTER III.

Late in the afternoon I tramped into Marshmineter. It was by no means my first visit to that sleepy provincial town. Under the shadow of the cathedral towe dwelt relatives with whom I had afore time spent school and college holidays. Their house was the goal of my pilgrim age, and a week's rest was to reconp me for the toils of the walking tour. The tragic occurrence at the Fen inn altered all my plans. With an assassin to be tracked there was no time for com fortable idleness. Francis Briarfield ha been my friend and I owed it to his memory to avonge his death. It was no easy task I had set myself. I recognized that from the first.

In place, therefore, of seeking the cer ter of the town and my maiden aunt's I turned off at the outskirts and made for Bellin Hall. According to the story Francis, his brother was staying with the Belling, and it was necessar that I should see him at once about th matter. My acquaintance with Mrs. Bellin and her daughter was confined to casual conversation at crowded "at homes" during the season. I had hardly is an admission from high Republi- the right to thrust myself on them un invited, but my business brooked no delay. The sconer Felix knew the truth the better it would be for him. On arriving at the front door I learned that Mr. Briarfield was within and sent up my card, requesting a private interview. For the present I did not wish to see Olivia, as it was my intention to ing prepared for yot.—New Orleans Pic. view. warn Felix that I was cognizant of his rickery. My theory was proved correct by the following dialogue: Myself—Is Mr. Briarfield within? Footman—Yes, sir. Mr. Francis Briarfield has just returned from town,

After which question and answer was shown into a room. Observe that had said "Mr. Briarfield," and the foot-man answered "Mr. Francis Briarfield." Now, as I well knew that the man bearing that name was lying dead at the Fen inn, it was conclusive proof that Felix, to gain the hand of Olivia, was masquerading as his brother. I had just argued this out to my complete satisfac-tion when Felix made his appearance. The resemblance between the brothers
